resecution had stained his name, and caused his discharge from his office when they knew that there was no case against him.

Mr. Bliss indignantly denied the charge, saying that Turner had been discharged from the indictment by the government the congressional investigation were touched upon, and the assertion was made that it had substantially justified Gen. Brady's acts. The prosecution had spoken of Gen. Brady's immense wealth, said Mr. Wilson; had held up the Chattanooga stock as a mine of wealth, and in the next minute had spoken of it as Of the telephone stock he could remember when it was a wildcat stock, worth next to nothing. Men made money out of such in-vestments, and that, too, without rascality. Mr. Wilson concluded his long address by warn-Mr. Wilson concluded his long address by warning the jury to give no heed to vituperation and fishwife talk when Mr. Merrick came to close the case. He did not mean to call Mr. Merrick a fishwife, but he wanted the jury to remember that a shout of "conspirator" did not prove the crime.

The court then adjourned.

The Gas Frand. Night before last there were 5,000 strangers Night before last there were 5,000 strangers in Washington, and yesterday many of these people were remarking upon the fact that there were no street lamps in the capitol city. The citizens vainly pointed out the lampposts to the critical strangers, and explained that they were numerous in overy section, but the war scarred veterans shook their heads and declined to believe that the iron uprights were other than hitching posts or scratch my-backs erected by some philanthropic imitator of the duke of Argyle. It is not surprising that the strangers should have formed such an opinion. On Tuesday night there was not a lamp if in the city, and persons desirous of peregrinating around town were compelled to make their way by the sense of touch alone. It is high time for the lighting system of Washington to be revolutionized. The Washington Gaslight company should be ousted from its supreme dictatorship if by no other means the public's desire can be attained. It would be infinitely preferable to have the streets illuminated by oil lamps, than to depend upon the spassnote gas, which in turn depends upon the intermittent clouds. The people of this city have passively suffered the gaseous Indignity long enough. It is time for the inauguration of active measures.
